I take special interest in this as you guys seem to know how to do all this stuff inherently and I just don't. I've been scared to "flush" my power steering fluid even though I have a noise upon cold engine startup which might be the fluid. I had asked the parts guy and he gave me power steering fluid (he said it was Dexron II) which I put in, only to find out belatedly it's ???

@Canadacaravan I used the same approach as you (ie. suck it out, fill it up, turn the steering wheel a lot, rinse & repeat) on my Ford Focus last summer. I doubt the Focus' power steering system holds much more than your van - if I were to bet, I'd say it held less than your van. The power steering fluid was terribly old and super dark.

Flushing The Power Steering System. Completely flushing the power steering system requires some technical know-how and can be a mess. It's also helpful to have a helper on hand. Disconnect the low-pressure return hose and direct it into a bucket or drain pan. You probably will need a length of hose to reach the pan.
